

Financial Translations

A pair of gold-rimmed glasses with red-tinted lenses is positioned over a financial line chart. The chart is drawn on a grid of thin lines and shows a line with several peaks and troughs, representing market data. The background is a warm, golden-brown color, and the overall lighting is soft and focused on the glasses and the chart.

Is this bull or what?

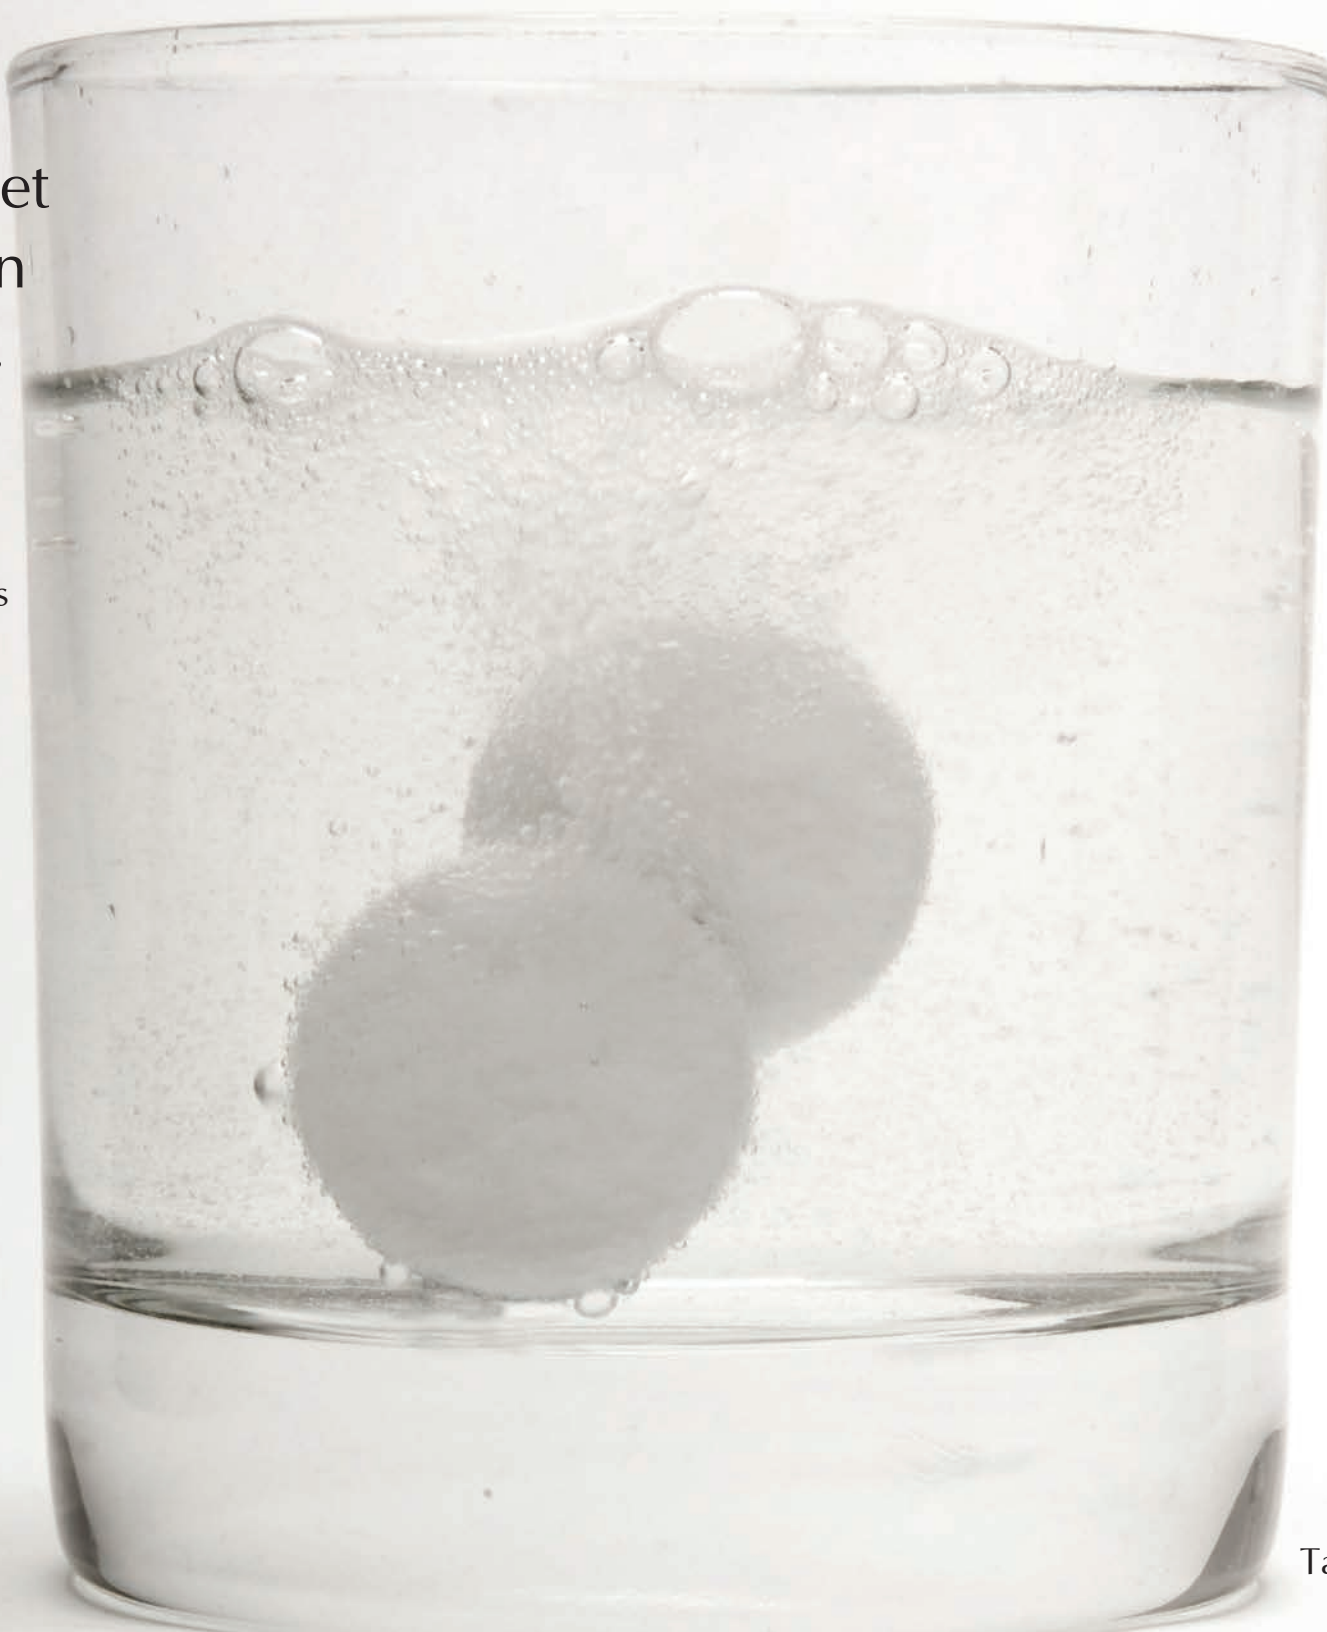

Preparing financial documents for foreign countries can be maddeningly complex.

Each country has its own financial terminology based on their local rules and regulations. To successfully do business with countries worldwide, you must ensure that your financial material is translated precisely. That's where we come in.

We can keep a secret.
We stake our reputation on it!

We have never had a breach of confidentiality in our 30-year history. At One Planet we regard confidentiality as paramount. We have translated market sensitive materials for many clients including the tariffs and pricing structure for the overnight parcel delivery industry, classified material for various governmental agencies and confidential material for the legal industry.

Some of our clients require financial translation services performed on their premises. No problem.

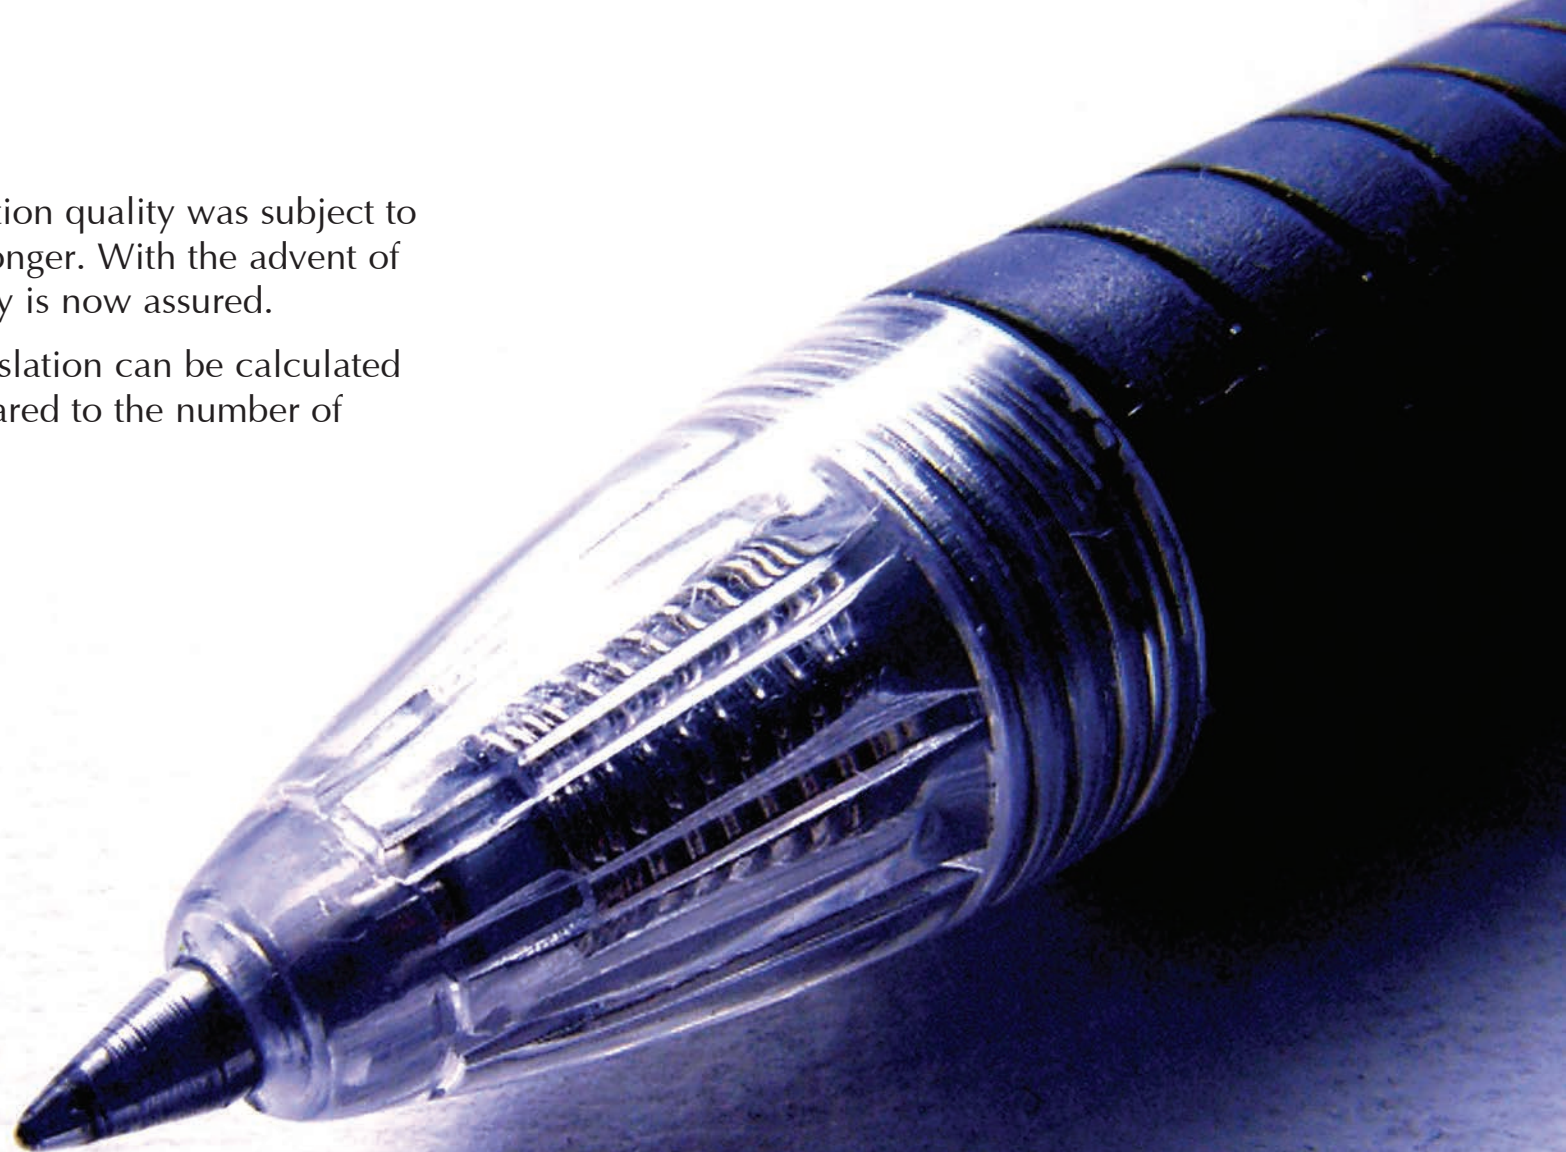

Put to the test.

Historically, measuring translation quality was subject to individual interpretation. No longer. With the advent of strict industry standards, quality is now assured.

A composite score for any translation can be calculated by the sum of the errors compared to the number of words in the text.

Most errors can be traced to:

1. Improper terminology
2. Syntactic misuse
3. Omissions
4. Word structure
5. Misspelling
6. Punctuation
7. Miscellaneous

This straightforward, statistical approach is perfectly suited for terminology-rich industries such as finance and insurance.

We always go the extra mile!
